$1.25 September 8, 2003 • Volume 14 Number 16 The Business Newspaper for Central Massachusetts / Metrowest

Worcester Business Journal has found another bumper crop of Forty under 40 winners for 2003. Whether operating their own companies or climbing the corporate ladder, these 40 outstanding individuals have achieved significant professional success. In addition, they've distinguished themselves for also giving back to their community, and making our region a better place. Along with Junior Achievement and our many sponsors, we salute this year's outstanding winners!

Sean Anderson is poised to become a future 40 Under Forty winner

If small business is the backbone of today's economy, this year's 40 Under Forty award winners are the backbone of local small business. Despite a challenging business climate, they are more than up for the task. Whether they are operating their own companies in Central Massachusetts or are serving those who do, this year's line up of young, talented business professionals exemplify the hard work, commitment and creativity that propels our present and future economy with energy and enthusiasm.

In this, the fourth year in which the Worcester Business Journal and the Junior Achievement of Central Massachusetts Inc. have conducted these awards, we once again had our work cut out for us in selecting just 40 winners from the impressive slate of nearly 100 nominees we received. Among them was eight-year-old Westboro inventor Sean Anderson, the youngest nominee we've ever received. Sean accidentally invented a laser tag game that is the basis for SeanO Corp., which is operated by his dad, Mark Anderson, and sells products to major retailers including K-Bee Toys and Learning Express. While we congratulate Sean on his achievement, we figured we'd give him a few more years before including him in our 40 Under Forty honorees.
